Writes That He Had Been In Hospital Suffering From Indigestion Attack

Joseph Crawford, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Crawford, who is serving his country in the 16th U. S. He wrote his mother at that time that he was in the hospital at Brownsville suffering from indigestion, not wishing to tell her that he was shot, knowing that she would worry. THINKS M'CORMICK SHOULD BE PICKED

SENATOR SWIFT FROM FOSS DISTRICT, SAYS M'CORMICK IS STRONGEST MAN.

On July 23 State Senator Rodney A. Swift of Waukegan, Ill., made some very interesting remarks concerning the nomination of a republican candidae for United States senate. He strongly favored Congressman Medill McCormick, of Ogle county. The following extract is from his talk:

"Mr. Foss has been my personal friend, but Mr. McCormick is the strongest man of those who are presented to the consideration of Illinois republicans for the senatorship. I know of no spot in Mr. McCormick's record that disqualifies him. He is the candidate the republicans of Illinois should support. Unequivocally and whole-heartedly, although I am in Congressman Foss' district, I say that Mr. McCormick ought to be nominated by the republicans in September and elected in November."

NEW STATUE OF LINCOLN FINISHED

By Associated Press Leased Wire

Springfield, Ill., July 25—Andrew O'Connor's heroic statue of Abraham Lincoln has been erected in the capitol grounds here and accepted by the Illinois centennial commission and the state board of art advisers.

This program was abandoned, however, and the statue of "Lincoln the Sorrowful" now stands open to public view. It will be dedicated at the October exercises.

Lee County Strip of National Road Will Therefore Be Much Improved

(Special to THE TELEGRAPH)

Springfield, Ill, July 25—A stretch of the Lincoln Highway between Fulton, Ill., on the Mississippi river opposite Clinton, Ia., and the point where the pavement leaves off at DeKalb, extending through the counties of Whiteside, Lee, Ogle and DeKalb, will be constructed this year, even though the State Highway Commission has rejected bids for the portions of the same, owing to the excessive prices asked by the contractors who put in bids.

The Division of Highways of the State Department of Public Works & Buildings has decided to construct the portions between Fulton and De Kalb on their own initiative, under the supervision of Fred A. Tarrant, Division Engineer of the Highway Department.

The scheme has the approval of the federal government as the highway is valuable for military purposes.

PERSHING AND FOCH RENEW APPEALS FOR MORE Y. M. C. A. HELP

4,000 Business and Professional Men Need At Once For Duty Over-Seas

PART OF THE MILITARY

Y. M. C. A. Has Taken Very Prominent Place In U. S. War Machinery

Renewed appeals from General Pershing and General Foch, together with the plans of the government at Washington, to have nearly 1,500,000 in France by September, have resulted in a new drive by the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. to recruit approximately 4,000 business and professional men for overseas duty during the summer. New York City has accepted a quota of 1,000 men above draft age to serve the soldiers abroad in Red Triangle huts and other Y. M. C. A. recruiting organizations over the country are making an effort to enlist the services of 3,000 other men.

"The men most needed here are the men most needed in France today," says an announcement received here today by Allen W. Davis, general secretary of the local Young Men's Christian Association. "The Y. M. C. A. is basing its appeal for men on the ground that there is no job in France too small for the biggest man in any American community. The Y. M. C. A. workers in France have had to become a part of the military machine. General Pershing relies upon the Association to keep up the morale of the troops so that with military training they may become the most efficient fighting machines that ever went into active war service.

"First of all, there is a pressing demand for men who are natural leaders, men who are real men, good mixers and capable of exerting

YANKS DOGGEDLY KEEP ON MARCH; CRY FROM THEIR UTTER FATIGUE

Glenn Rynearson Writes Of Forced March That Took Them To The Front

ALREADY UNDER FIRE

Shells Commenced Falling About Them As They Reached Destination

Unde rdate of June 18, Corporal Glenn Rynearson of the 108th Engineers, on duty in France, writes his mother, Mrs. G. E. Rynearson, of 1010 Third sttreet, as follows:

Well, how is everybody at home this week? I hope they are all as well as myself, for I am feeling fine except for a hungry feeling that has bee nwith me for the last couple of weeks. The eats are not what they were in the states, at least there is no tas much as w had there but then we will get used to doing with less, even after a long day.

When I wrote you last I said I thought we would be moving soon. Well, we got up the next morning at 3 o'clock and were on the road before 7, carryin gan 85-pound pack on our backs, a gun and 100 rounds of ammunition. We marched about eight miles before 10 a. m., and then once more climbed into a box car and rode until nearly 2 p. m. Then we were marched up to where we are now.

Marched 22 Miles.

We covered about 22 miles that day, on what I kould call one meal. And tired! Say, I don't believe I was so tired in my life. Many fell out on the way and others walked along crying at the last. We were given something to eat and some hot tea, after which we laid down on the ground and fell asleep immediately—it was nearly 12 p. m. I will never

FRANCO-AMERICANS IN STEADY ADVANCE THRU DESPERATE RESISTANCE

London Rumors Have It That British Tommies Have Made a Great Advance and That Crown Prince's Troops Are Hopelessly Pocketed—French and Americans Continue Steady Advance in Soissons-Rheims Salient

BULLETIN

By Associated Press Leased Wire

London, July 25.—The Pall Mall Gazette says that rumors are current that British troops have made a great advance in the direction of Fismes, about mid-way between Rheims and Soissons.

It is also reported that French forces have advanced in another point in the Aisne-Marne salient and that the army of the German Crown Prince is placed in a position out of which extrication seems to be impossible.

BULLETIN.

By Associated Press Leased Wire

With the American Army On the Marne, July 25, 1:30 P. M.—Franco-American troops this morning advanced their lines north of the River Marne more steadily. The Germans are continuing their retreating movement toward the north.

The French and Americans also made gains at other points along the 55 miles of battle front. The Germans are viciously resisting in the majority of cases.

The entente allied forces in the territory north of Chateau Thierry are paying less attention to running down machine gun nests, and are advancing their whole line, small detachments being left to clean up the enemy machine gun crews.

BULLETIN.

(Associated Press Leased Wire)

French Army Headquarters, July 25.—Via Ottawa.—French troops are now within three miles of the town of Fere-en-Tardenois, which is the meeting point of eight roads. It is the center of German communication in this region. The town is being heavily shelled, and is daily bombed by entente allied air squadrons.

WAR SUMMARY.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

German rear guards have again hurled themselves against the pursuing allied forces on the south bank of the Marne, and before the momentum of the blow the allies were obliged to withdraw to a little wood north of the town of Treloup and they were forced back from the village of Chassins, a little further east. The success of the Germans, however, was shortlived, for they were immediately driven back in a renewed attack.

Northward along the line toward Soissons and to the northeast toward Rheims, there have been heavy bombardments, but there have been no infantry actions reported. As the days of heavy fighting continue on the battle front north of the Marne it becomes increasingly apparent that the German retirement is well under way. This withdrawal is apparently being conducted in an orderly, if not deliberate manner, covered by rear guard actions.

A study of the map shows that along the line from Jaulgonne northwest to Oulchy-Le-Chateau, just north of the Ourcq, or even farther, the allies have pressed ahead during the last two days. As nearly as the location of the contending forces can be determined at present the German retirement over much of this line since Tuesday has been 3 miles.

North of the river Ourcq the situation is obscure because of lack of details. It may be said, however, for the moment, that the line from Soissons south to the Ourcq has reached a state of equilibrium, and that the deadlock between the offensive action of the allies an dthe defensive action of the Germans will probably continue until the former can bring up sufficient fresh troops to break through the line at some vital point.

Allied progress southward has placed in jeopardy the village of Fere-en-Ghoisms, one of the most important German bases in this region.

Military critics have concluded that Cheif of Staff Ludendorff will probably launch a new attack on some other sector on the line in an effort to gain a local success to cover up his failure on the Marne. He might also attempt to wrest the initiative from General Foch and force the latter to move troops from the Soissons-Rheims area. They seem Lived Only One Life.

The noblest of great men who have expressed themselves through art, science and industry have lived but one life apiece. That one, though, was so exemplary that nothing needed to be hidden; else the veil drawn over their erroneous ways also would have blurred the vision of those very ideals they so clearly saw and expressed.

Uncovering the Illusion.

Suppose you should be startled in the dark night by something which looked like a specter? Would not he who should bring a lantern and show you that it was but a white cloth hanging to a bush give you far greater encouragement than he who merely exhorted you to keep up your heart, look the other way, whistle, and pass on?—Whately.

Estrayed—Black calf about nine months old. Finder please notify Joseph Auchestetter, R. 1, West Brooklyn, Ill.

Through the kindness of the postmaster we are able to print a description of the new rural routes established here and which will become effective August 1st. The old route No. 1 will be discontinued and a carrier from Compton will come to this office and receive mail and deliver practically all the old route south and east of town. The new route No. 1 will comprise the greater part of the old route No. 3. George Halbmaier having been appointed temporary carrier and leaving town north, 1 mile, west to Jno. Derr, retrace, east to Ikens corner, north 2 miles to Ponto corner, west to Nelles school house and north to cover all of old route not already covered. Then when reaching Alex Gehant jog comes south to Adolph Chaon corner west to four corners and home.

The new route No. 2, carried by E. E. Vincent will leave south out of town to Erbers corner, west to Delhotal, jog south, then west to Baub's corner, north to F. E. Biggart and east to Wm. Halbmaier, and north to Derr's corner and continue original route until reaching the Nelles schoolhouse north two and one-half miles home.

It is hoped by the above description that patrons on both the old and new will have an idea of the new schedules and can arrange their outgoing mail accordingly. The Compton carrier will not report at the West Brooklyn postoffice again the same day, hence that will inconvenience those living south and east of town a little more than the others affected by the change. Any other questions will be readily answered by inquiry at the local office, or thru the carrier.

Says His Prescription Has Powerful Influence Over Rheumatism

Discoverer Tells Druggists ... to Take a Cent of Anyone ... ney Unless Allenrhu Complet... ishes All Rheumatic Pain... Twinges.

Mr. James H. Allen suffered for years with rheumatism. Many times this terrible disease left him selpless and unable to work.

He finally decided, after years of ceaseless study, that no one can be free from rheumatism unti lthe accumulated impurities, commonly called uric acid deposits, were dissolved in the joints and muscles and expelled from the body.

With this idea in mind he consulted physicians, made experiments and finally compounded a prescription that quickly and completely banished every sign and symptom of rheumatism from his system.

He freely gave his discovery to others, who took it, with what might be called marvelous success. After years of urging he decided to let sufferers everywhere know about his discovery through the newspapers. Druggists handle Allenrhu in this vicinity with the understanding that they will freely return the purchase money to all who state they receive no benefit.

SAYS BIG JOB IS AT HOME

I had to come to France to learn that it is the army of the rear, back in the states, that is going to win or lose the war.

The foregoing is part of a letter from an American university man, now an artillery officer in the French army. Continuing, he writes:

The army in France will do nothing new or extraordinary in building several miles of new railroad to the front. But it was a momentous event when Wilson pooled the equipment and management of the railroads of the United States. Our engineers are building several hundred kilometers of military highway, but the Romans did as much a couple of thousand years ago, and did it much better—so well, in fact, that we still use their foundations. The important thing is: Will you send us the trucks and supplies to roll over these roads? The mere fact of digging a trench is nothing in itself—the wops are the best at it—but will you build the ships to send the men over to fill them?

When I compare the importance of your work with ours, I grow envious. Before us we have the boche—but alongside of you you have the pacifist, the defectionist, the selfish laborite, the greedy manufacturer, and worst of all the loafer.

The administration has demonstrated its dependence on public sentiment, and there you have another big interesting daily work. Of course, public sentiment is just your opinion and everybody else's added together and divided by 1,000,000,000. But to have the right opinion, to express it, to argue it, to fight the element that seeks to use a crisis to further political aims, to watch for treason and expose it, there is a game worth playing.

It is pathetic how the muddy, shivering soldier down there engrossed in his little miseries and trifling joys, is dependent upon his comrade in the rear, who too often forgets his task, or even the existence of the war—and yet it is he alone who can bring the soldier back. The war has done badly so far because the army of the rear, from the short-sighted diplomat to the striking laborer, has failed to realize the size of his burden.

There is only one man who can integrate the forces of the allies, and he is the president of the United States. He can do it because he controls the money bag, the food basket and the reserve man power—but he must have the support of the American public, the army of the rear. You have no idea how eagerly we watch for the communique from the zone of big things.

In the meantime we must continue our flea hunting, our drills, our mathematics, and every once in a while take a big risk. And while you tackle the big problems our outlook is a few square kilometers of mud or a block or so of barracks, and our concern is whether the new lot of tobacco will arrive Wednesday and whether it will be horse or cow for supper.

BACK TO THE CLASSICS

Lately educators were lamenting that the Greek and Roman classics were dead—as dead as the languages they were embalmed in. Now all at once there are signs of revival. High schools and colleges report a renewed interest in Latin especially. Greek is attracting more attention than it has for some years.

With German in disfavor, there is a natural quest for a substitute; and the most acceptable "ersatz," according to the educators, is Latin. Great numbers of young people want to learn French and Spanish; but these languages are little more than dialects of Latin, and are learned far more easily and accurately if one has first gained a moderate knowledge of the mother tongue. Latin likewise gives easy access to Italian and Portuguese.

It has the same value it has always had as a help in the correct speaking and writing of the English language, which is nearly two-thirds derived from Latin. It is said by experts to give a much better insight into the fundamentals of grammar than German does. It has a high commercial value, because so much commercial phraseology in nearly all European languages is Latin. It gives a far better initiation into scientific studies than German does, because the big majority of technical terms in all sciences are Latin.

Greek attracts again, despite its comparative difficulty. Men always seem to come back to Athens in connection with great movements of the human spirit. The renaissance which came after the dark ages was based on Greek literature and learning. After this war, when as we sometimes fancy all things will be made new, it will be natural enough, educators say, to draw inspiration once more from old Greek life and thought, with its eternal freshness and its incomparably greater beauty, truth and humanity than we find in German kultur.

to be agreed that the logical point to expect such an attack is somewhere along the British held line.

The British have been conducting raiding operations in the Buterne secto rand have repulsed attempted German raids along the Amiens front to the south.

Berlin continues to report that all allied thrusts have been defeated. The Germans also claim that the French advance toward the Avre northwest of Montdidier, in which the Germans lost 1,850 prisoners, 4 cannon and 300 machine guns, was of no effect.

The British and French shipping losses for the month of June have been the lowest established in 21 months.

GREAT LAKES BUSY TURNING OUT MEN

GREAT LAKES SENDS HALF OF RECRUITS TO UNITED STATES NAVY

Great Lakes, Ill., July 24.—The central recruiting district, comprising the middle western and southern states, is furnishing half of the reserve men for the entire navy, according to Lieutenant-Commander R. S. Culp, U. S. N., recruiting inspector for this district. He made the statement at a recent conference of the recruiting officers under his direction at this station.

More men were enrolled in the Ninth, Tenth and Eleventh districts, which includes this territory, during the month of June than during the entire year following the declaration of war.

In the eight weeks from May 15 to July 16 Chicago leads in the enrollment with 6,580 men while Great Lakes comes second with a record of 4,340. Others of the first cities stand in the following order: Milwaukee, 3,728; St. Louis, 3,046; Kansas City, 2,679; Cincinnati, 2,366; Indianapolis, 2,248; Louisville, 2,172 and Detroit, 2,153.

"The sturdy men from the middle west make the best sailors," said Lieutenant Commander Culp. "There has been much talk of whether the city boy or the country boy is the sturdier. In the vast middle west where there is so much agriculture the record of the son of the soil is better than that of his city brother. This is not always true in other districts, but has been found to be the case in our territory."

VAILE AND O'MALLEY

LIVE NEWS CONCERNING ROCK RIVER ASSEMBLY

Vice President Thomas R. Marshall is a much advertised man. He has been a long time in public life. He was born in Indiana. He became a lawyer. He was a member of the Indiana legislature. He was afterwards governor of the state.

When the democrats in national convention at Baltimore looked about for a candidate to run with Woodrow Wilson they picked Thomas R. Marshall of Indiana. They needed a running mate for Wilson from the central west, and Thomas R. Marshall seemed the best and the most available material. Wilson was elected and Marshall became president of the United States senate.

When the vice president entered official life in Washington he became very popular from the beginning. Everyone in Washington likes "Tom" Marshall. He is one of the people. He is far from being officious. He will "see" anyone, and he will "see" many whom he ought not to "see," but he likes people and likes to mingle with them.

You can frequently see Vice President Marshall eating lunch at the Union Station cafe before taking a train. He abhors style, is a modest dresser, and many times in a week you can see him and his close companion, Mrs. Marshall, strolling down F street in Washington, frequently stopping to look at the display windows. He loves to stroll about Washington in the evening. Many people in Washington, however, do not know the vice president when they see him pass or when they pass him on the street.

At the time of the big Red Cross parade, in which 10,000 women participated, President and Mrs. Wilson were in New York, and Vice President and Mrs. Marshall reviewed the parade, standing in an auto in front of the White House gates. Many of the young women in the parade did not salute the vice president because they did not know who the distinguished couple were standing in the auto.

When it became noticeable that so many did not salute the second couple of the country, an officer walked down through the parade and instructed the young woman what they should do when passing the White House gates. Afterward every one in the line saluted Mr. and Mrs. Marshall. Thousands of the young women in the parade were clerks in the various departments and they had not been in Washington long enough to become familiar with the high officials and dignitaries.

Marshall is a member of all the exclusive clubs in the capital city, but he seldom goes to club houses. He lives at the Willard, Washington's finest hotel, and lives there in a plain and quiet manner, frequently mingling with the guests of the hotel each evening when he is not otherwise engaged.

To show just what sort of a man Marshall is, it is well to relate an incident that happened in his office at the capitol. Tourists are taken into the vice president's office before 11 o'clock each day but Sunday.

One day a gentleman with several companions entered Marshall's office and seeing his chair unoccupied, remarked that he wished to sit in the chair. He did so. In a few minutes a small, dignified gentleman stepped into the office and the stranger in the chair said, "I am jsut trying the vice president's chair for a few seconds." "That's all right, my friend. Sit there just as long as you like for when I get ready to use the chair I will tell you." The stranger thought, of course, that the man who spoke was a tourist like himself, and said, "When I get through I will give it up to you." "Well ,you need not hurry at all, for it is a common matter for me to occupy that chair for I happen to be vice president, and many times I would much rather be somewhere else than sitting in that chair, especially this extremely hot day, so sit there just as long as you wish."

The tourist began to offer an explanation, but he was told to be at ease, that anyone who wished could use the chair when it is not occupied .

Vice President Thomas R. Marshall will be at the Rock River Assembly on Sunday, August 4th, and will deliver one of his famous addresses. Mr. Marshall is one of the most fluent talkers in the country, and he will be sure to please all who hear him when he comes to the Assembly.

YANKS DOGGEDLY KEEP ON MARCH; CRY FROM THEIR UTTER FATIGUE

forget hte last few miles of that hike. The sky was like one continuous flash after flash of lightning and with so much noise you could hardly think.

Making Dugouts.

The next day we spent making dugouts in the side of the hill. I am writing this letter in that dugout. It is dug in the ground and built up with sandbags around the outer edge and on the bottom we have straw. Really, mother, it is quite comfortable and I would hateto have Fritz advance.

We realized we were at war the nex tmorning, for the big ones (the shells) began to whistle over our heads and the airplanes flew around in greater numbers than birds. And the air battles!. Balloons and machine guns make it all realistic — much more so than one can get from the newspapers.

Were Under Fire.

On the second morning we started to work, and our working party had no soone rarrived at its post than thre eshells hit about fifty feet from them. It surely was a welcome (?). We have been working some up here but then everybody works and there are no Sundays.

Both Fritz and the allies must like the night time for they surely do some fighting htem, while some days you would think there was no war, it is so quiet. It rained nearly all day yesterday and when I came in I was just soaked, and today it was miserable. I hate to think what it will be in winter.

Last night we went back to —— (deleted by censor) camp, where they gave a program for us. During the show Fritz dropped a few shells around us and some over us. It surely seemed funny. We had a nice time and enjoyed the sow very much.

We got our second mail the day before yesterday, and there were no letters from home. I was surely disappointed. I must close for this time, mother, for I have written as much as is allowed. Don't worry about me. With lots of love to you all, from your loving son,

GLENN.

OLD GRAND DETOUR BOY IS STAFF ARTIST OF ARMY NEWSPAPER

Charles Phelps Cushing, A Nephew of Mrs. L. Backus, Now In France

ON STARS AND STRIPES

Tells Tow Yankee Fighters Celebrated Washington's Birthday "Over There"

Editor Telegraph:—

I saw an item in The Evening Telegraph recently regarding the Stars and Stripes.

We received from our son, Claude Backus, from Bombay, India, a copy of that paper. The article on the front page, first column, was written by Charles Phelps Cushing, First Lieutenant, M. C. R., and a member of the staff of the Stars and Stripes. He is a son of Will Cushing, (my wife's brother, and an old Grand Detour boy). His home now is in Kansas City, Mo. He worked on the Kansas City Star, and later for Collier's and Leslies.

The paper was sent to Claud from Paris by Dr. Wirt, a dentist who had been working with Claud at Poona, India, and has started for the United States. The ship he was on was sunk by a submarine, but the passengers were all saved, although he lost all his baggage.

Yours.
Luther Backus

Lieut. Cushing's article, which deals with his trip through the American front line trenches on the evening of Washington's birthday, is as follows:

By CHARLES PHELPS CUSHING
1st Lieut. U.S.M.C.R. Staff Correspondent of The Stars and Stripes

Thanks to motor transportation, a correspondent for the Stars and Stripes had the chance to attend two Washington's birthday parties the same evening. One, in the brightly lighted dining room of a little French hotel back of the front. Another, under murky skies, in the American first line trenches.

The party in the hotel was conventional, but none the less picturesque. Half a dozen American officers, three young fellows in uniforms of horizon blue, two Italians and a stocky, goodnatured Briton got to their feet and cliinked glasses to the toast:

"Washington, Father of His Country!"

The toast had to be translated to the Italians via one of the French, and the Italians drank it first before they knew what it was all about; then, again—and heartier—after they understood. This of course, added to the merriment. The Briton then rose to confess that this was the first time he had ever toasted George Washington. And that, naturally called for another round.

Madame Smiles and Knits On

There was only one woman in the room, an elderly French Madame sitting at a little table alone and knitting. She looked up and smiled, then back to her stitches.

Outside it was chilly and raining. A single ray of yellow light filtered on to the wet pavement through the hotel shutters.

The press automobile, with dimmed lights, crept through the crooked streets to the outside of town and brought up beside a sentry box. There instructions were given that no lights should be shown and no motor horns sounded.

Along a long lonesome road lined with a double row of tall silhouetted trees, we set off for the front.

For an hour we had the road all to ourselves. The hum of the engine and the spatter of rain drops on the wind shield made the only sound.

Presently, a camion loomed up in the road and chugged past; then a rumbling train of ammunition wagons.

"Our boys," commented the driver "Can tell 'em by the helmets."

All of a sudden, out of the murk, something rushed by on our right, and something else, bound the same direction on our left. Zs-ss-t! Zs-ss-t! and both were gone.

"Our boys again," the driver chuckled. "Couple of machine guns on motors. Just racing, I guess."

The Fireflies of War

By this time we had reached a crest from which we could see a long distance beyond. Dead ahead, some tiny lights, like fireflies, were flashing.

"Those are the big guns," the driver explained. He paused; then whistled. "Lots of 'em tonight. Something on, I guess. Like as not they're celebrating the holiday."

Not until we pulled up at brigade headquarters could we hear the reverberations. In the closed car, with the motor churning, the front had seemed noiseless. But the moment the engine stopped and the door of the car was flung open, the air suddenly became aroar. You have heard the same sort of sound when a telephone line goes aground.

We brought out our gas masks, donned our helmets and reported at headquarters. Two minutes later we were humming along the road again.

We brought up at the end of the ride in the center of what had been a village square. What used to be a town was now a few jagged walls and some heaps of debris. Four men came out of the blackness of a ruined house to meet us. Two were Army officers; two newspaper correspondents.

"Hurry!" cautioned the conductor of the party. "This square is likely any time to be shelled again. Things have been rather lively around here this evening."

A Job to Our Liking

Along a muddy road, pocked with shell fire and occasionally as light as day from German star shells, we tramped in extended order until we came to another clump of ruins.

What seemed to be one of the most badly wrecked places of all—roofless and apparently about to crumble into a heap—sheltered our reception hall. In a little low-ceilinged place hidden in a corner of the ruin, we met the commander of the part of the line which we were about to visit. Less than an hour before our arrival a Boche shell had knocked a ton or more of debris down upon the bridge timbers of the ceiling and had dug up a big hole close by in the back yard.

Except for the fact that the concussion had put the office door out of commission and had jarred most of the furnishings down on to the deck, nothing had been affected. And, quite literally, nobody was losing any sleep over it. The runner who was to announce our "tourists" was asleep in his bunk in an adjoining room and had to make his evening dressing arrangements before he was presentable for company.

Meanwhile, the officers of the unit told us how pleased they were with the morale of the men. After the hard work of preparation back of the lines—so arduous that some of the boys had almost gone stale from overtraining — the trenches had "bucked everyone up" again.

"The hours are long here," the commander explained, smiling, "but this is a job to our liking."

Guided by Star Shells

The runner reported for duty and we set out in the night again down the main street. A ruined village has a certain beauty on a night like this—the beauty of seeming antiquity. Shell fire makes a Pompeii of it. None of us were surprised to see in the debris beside the road just such an ancient stone bath tub as the antique from Rome which the tourist finds in Paris in the Louvre. It couldn't have been a modern porcelain affair—not here in Pompeii!

The star shells heightened the illusion that this was, after all, a sort of Pain's fireworks exhibition, such as we used to see in boyhood days.

We came out into the open just as a star shell brightened the fields beyond and showed us the head of the communicating boyau leading to the trenches. The American artillery was blazing away in a sort of Fourth of July celebration, with an occasional sulky reply from the Hun, who didn't appear to have much heart for the proceedings.

The boyau deepened and we felt our way along the duck boards in single file. Yes, it was muddy! No one was sorry he had put on rubber hip boots. A slip off the boards on a wet night such as this may drop you in water up to the knees.

Here and there we stopped—to pass the countersign with a guard, to watch a sniper at work, to allow two soldiers with a marnite of hot coffee suspended on a pole pass by.

A Glimpse of No Man's Land

Whee-ee! Whee-ee! from overhead. Those were random shots. No one made any comment. The trenches became almost a maze as we got farther along. The visitors lost all sense of direction. Presently, the conducting officer halted us in a crossing, where there was room enough to crowd close around him, and made a brief comment on what was going on:

"Probably won't be much more doing tonight. You notice that the artillery seems to have decided to take things a bit easier. What you're seeing now is just a typical night in this sector. Typical weather, too."

We went on more slowly until we reached a point not more than 200 yards from the German trenches; there the orders were "no talking". A little farther on we took turns at having a glimpse of No Man's Land through a loop hole. The scenic features were simple, consisting chiefly of tangles of wire and a few flashes of gun fire from the dark background.

A stop in a platoon commander's dugout for hot coffee served in canteen cups varied the program of tramping through the maze of trenches.

Tools of the Trade

As the artillery action kept dwindling, the trenches began to take on more the air of this-is-just-our-ordinary job. Except for an occasional clip from a machine gun at objects of suspicion in No Man's Land, nothing further disturbed the night as we made our return journey to the communication boyau. The tools of the trade —rockets, chevaux-de-frise hand grenades, automatic rifles—were ready for action, with silent doughboys standing beside them, but nothing happened.

We could have had a first class party in the trenches on Washington's Birthday, but the Hun didn't choose to celebrate. Maybe he thought the weather wasn't just right.

The correspondent who made this visit to the trenches (described above) carried with him a bundle of The Stars and Stripes which had just come off the presses. The papers were distributed the following morning to the men who had spent the night in the trenches.

ASK MORE MEN FOR Y.M.C.A. OVER THERE

the proper influence. These leaders generally are assigned as hut secretaries, in which position they will require a versatility almost inconceivable. They must be above the fighting age, but must be able to undergo as searching a physical examination as does the man admitted to the combat branches of the service. Ambassador Sharp, in a recent appeal for more workers, emphasized the fact that many were breaking under the terrific strain.

Workers Are Fighters.

"That is the answer to those who regard the Y. M. C. A. as a paradise for pacifists, a refuge for slackers. We can use none of them in our service. At least one in eight or ten of our workers in France is in the shell zone. Recent dispatches have told of the gassing of our workers, of their death or serious injury caused by bursting shrapnel. The uniform of the Red Triangle is not for the man who does not want to go to war. It is the uniform that every 'middle-aged' man should aspire to wear. Although it gives him no military rank it gives him the opportunity for patriotic service and distinction — many 'Y' workers in France have already been cited for bravery."

Further fields of usefulness require experts in sports and education, and motor mechanics. Hundreds of men with a capacity for leadership in mass athletics are needed. Men who drive their own automobiles are being recruited for the motor transport service in France. Prominent educators are enlisting for the great Khaki College that General Pershing has authorized in conjunction with the training in the concentration camps back of the western front.

The War Personnel Board of the Central Military Department, comprising fifteen middle western states, reached its high mark in recruiting men and women for Y. M. C. A. service in June, when a total of 747 men and women were enrolled. This was considered a typical month in recruiting. Of this number 495 men and 23 women were assigned to overseas duty. The number enlisted for work in the home camps was 229 men. Illinois and Chicago took the lead in recruiting, with a total of 144 men and women assigned to foreign and domestic duty. Ohio followed with 83 men and women, and Iowa took third place with 73 recruits. Indiana and Kentucky tied for fourth place, with 69 recruits from each state. Other states represented in a table of totals for recruiting just received are as follows: Colorado, 34; Kansas, 37; Michigan, 41; Minnesota, 64; Missouri, 52; Nebraska, 25; North Dakota, 15; South Dakota, 4; Wisconsin, 34; Canada, 3.

STERLINGITE GETS A COMMISSION

Oliver H. Becktel of Sterling has been commissioned a second lieutenant of infantry in the national army.

"I Long for the Things He Can't Give Me!"

This is what every struggling young man who marries a wealthy girl fears—fears that his wife will long for the things he can't afford to give her.

And in the case of Ruth and Brian Hackett, this was true; Ruth did crave luxuries and the things to which she had been accustomed.

Brian saw this. He knew that his wife was not satisfied with his humble home. And it cut deep. It took all the joy out of his heart.

"Then, Ruth's love was not the real thing!" you will say—for, we all know that real love can flourish in a hovel. But you are wrong: Ruth's love was the real thing. She proves that in the end. How?

THE NIGHT FLYER

By HENRY M. NEELY

CHAPTER 1.
Flirting With Death.

It was such a day as the novice delights in—warm to the verge of overpowering indulgence, without even the hint of a breeze to catch under the far edge of a plane and require quick righting; and clear as crystal with a hot sun shining down through a sky guiltless of so much as even a shred of cloud.

The whole earth seemed stretching itself lazily for a midsummer siesta; and the last thought that could possibly have come to me as Ted Spencer trundled my sleek Bleriot out of the hangar and across the enclosure to the starting place, was that a flight—begun merely to escape the boredoom and lethargy of the dozing field—was to plunge me into a tangle of dilemmas of such world-wide notoriety before the day was done.

I remember glancing at the long row of sheds as I adjusted my helmet.

Every door was tightly closed. There was not a human soul about the aerodrome except my mechanician and me. In the hangar next to my own, I knew Alonzo Sanojas was sleeping and possibly also his chief, Miguel Casserta. The others had all been out early in the morning, had made their practise flights, locked up their machines again and returned to the city.

But Casserta did not fly as we others did.

We called him, derisively, the Night Flier, and it had come to be a standing form of joke among us to make caustic remarks about the invention upon which he was working. Casserta bore it all with patient Mexican shrugs and Sanojas, his mechanician, merely smiled blandly and spread his hands apart in a gesture that seemed to say that he really knew nothing at all about the matter.

The man with the invention that is going to "revolutionize" the science of aviation is known on every flying field in the country.

He talks mysteriously and importantly of his experiments, works away at some sort of outlandish contraption until his money gives out, never even so much as attempts to fly and finally quietly disappears.

But Casserta could not readily be put in this class for two reasons: first, he had a most efficient and costly imported Farman biplane powered with a 70 Gnome motor and, second, there was no doubt of his ability to fly.

None of us had actually seen him in the air because, as I have said, his flying was all done at night, but loungers in the barroom of the nearby crossroads hotel declared that they heard his motor overhead almost nightly and that his flights were by no means the little ground-hugging jaunts around the field that marked the efforts of the average.

Casserta always climbed high, cut away across country to the south or southeast and returned long after the natives had gone to bed.

So, whatever, his experiments, we regarded him seriously in spite of our joking, for the men who can make flights like that and land in the darkness is an aviator not to be dispised.

"Going to be up long, Mr. Carrigan?" Tad asked me.

I glanced overhead at the dreamy blue and all about me through the shimmering haze of heat that hung upon the earth.

"I don't know," I said. "If I find it pleasant up there, I'll stay a while."

I threw over the propeller as Tad braced himself to hold the machine. Then I stood for several minutes by the fuselage, listening to the deep, sweet drone of the Gnome as it settled to its work and hoping I should find it cooler above than on the ground.

Finally, satisfied that all was working smoothly, I mounted to the seat, gave Tad the signal to let go and I was soon on the wing, climbing slowly and gradually as the earth slipped away under me at a rate of sixty miles an hour.

It was, as I had hoped, cooler above.

There was no objective point to be made for in the flight; all I wanted was relief from the heat and ennui of the deserted field, so I set my left foot slightly forward with the steering bar, pulled the cloche back for a very gradual climb and settled comfortably in the seat, removing my helmet to get the bracing effects of the air.

With the controls set as they were, the course of the Bleriot was a wide circle with a diameter of twenty miles or more. By the time I had risen to two thousand feet I was swinging almost due east and I caught a silvery glint on the horizon ahead, reminding me that the ocean was there and that I should soon be over its cooling waters where the temperature would be at least ten degrees cooler.

Gradually the silver streak widened as I neared it and, when I had come within ten miles, it stretched out invitingly on either hand with two tiny blotches of black smoke rising out of the far edge where coasting steamers plied their way many miles off shore.

Little by little the nose of the Bleriot turned northward.

In ten minutes I was over the breakers and heading northeast out to sea. But there was no danger in the course. I was so high that a volplane to land would be an easy matter should anything go wrong, so I sat perfectly still, enjoying every moment of the perfect conditions and knowin gthat the sweep of my circle would bring me back over earth some miles farther north.

Below me, on the left, the line of breakers glistened and scintillated in the full sunlight. From my great height, the sinister details of rocks and sandbars were invisible, but I remembered that it was a coast avoided by ships and one that held out no hope, but slow starvation and thirst to one cast upon it.

The shore proper was far inland of the line of breakers.

The first shock of the seas was broken by jutting rocks and craggy islets. Hundreds of them were strewn along the whole coast for miles and, every here and there, the white gleam of level sands told of the wicked bars, glaring and dry at low tide, but swept by swirling currents as the water rose. And I knew that in between were the deep crevices through which the water boiled with the ebb and flow in a way that meant death to the strongest swimmer.

Far to the north, as my eye followed the tossing spray, the shore jutted out to a rocky point where the ocean swept around in a great arc to the west. As I mentally measured the circumference of the circle I was flying I saw that it would bring me over this point in my sweep back toward home.

Not a movement of cloche or footbar had I felt in all that long flight.

Not so much as a breath of air came to tug at the controls and keep me alert, and soon I caught myself starting out of a doze just in time to recover the balance that I had almost lost. I was numb with air-sleepiness.

"Here," I admonished myself, "this will not do. That's the way Schaeffer and Howarth went."

I half rose in my seat and sat down again several times to arouse myself by movement of some kind. My right foot tingled and I took it from the steering bar and stretched it out ahead of me to get the stagnant blood in circulation and, as I did so, my toe caught in a wire leading to the switch and pulled the connection loose.

Instantly the motor stopped, and I plunged.

Long training guided me into the safe angle for a volplane and I reached down to try to get the wire end and replace it on the binding post. But it was just beyond my reach. There was nothing for me to do but to hunt a landing place and repair it.

Sweeping the shore line in a quick glance I saw that the jutting point of which I have already spoken was just ahead and that, instead of being bare and forbidding as I had at first supposed, had a cluster of tiny huts upon it—half a dozen, I judged in my rapid survey.

This meant human help in starting me again and a smooth stretch of white sand alongside smiled up invitingly. Nursing the speed of the machine, I floated gently down in a spiral and took the smooth sand at the far end, heading back toward the huts on the final run.

Stopped at last, I looked about me, half expecting to see a group of frightened and illy-clad men gazing at me in astonishment and probably in terror at such an apparition descending upon them from the clouds. But no such sight greeted me.

Instead, I saw a woman hurry around the corner of one of the huts, glance back as though to see if she were followed, and then run toward me.

Even at that distance I was surprised to see that she was garbed, not in the rough clothing that I had expected to find in such surroundings, but in a long linen motor dust-coat, and that her hair was dressed quite in the fashion of the day.

Within ten feet of me she paused and revealed to me the most beautiful face that I had ever seen.

"I've had an accident—" I began.

"Yes, I know," she interrupted tensely. "But you must go away at once. You are Mr. Carrigan. I recognized the machine."

"But—" I began again. She stopped me with a warning gesture and an apprehensive glance at the huts.

"Hurry and go," she cried. "They are asleep now, but if they waken and find you here they will kill you."

"They—"

"Oh, don't you see you are in danger? Go quickly. I tell you they will kill you."

CHAPTER II.
I Offer My Services.

In spite of my surprise and the rapidity with which we exchanged our words, the impression which she made upon me was so vivid that I carry it to this day indelibly fixed upon my memory. This is due, perhaps, to a great extent, to my astonishment at finding such a woman—or girl, rather, for she was scarcely more than twenty—in such an isolated place and among such surroundings.

It needed only that first glance from above to show me that the huts that huddled together on the rocky point were the poorest and most dilapidated imaginable.

In fact I had mentally assigned them to the lowest class of beachcombers as I circled down toward them in my volplane. Fishermen's houses they could scarcely be, for no fishing boat could possibly be launched from that point and live through the surrounding swirls and tide rips to get out to sea.

And the same treacherous conditions stretched landward for fully half a mile before the solid earth rose out of the salt marshes.

It was only natural then to suppose that, on a shore so notorious for its dangers and so unfitted for the support of human life in any other form, the inhabitants of the hovels must be of that uncouth and usually desperate class of men who feed like vultures upon the bones of wrecked and deserted ships.

But what could such a girl be doing with men of this type?

The beauty of which I have spoken was not only the perfection of form and color; it was more in the marvelous depths of the hazel eyes that looked up so apprehensively and appealingly to me, in the moving resonance of the rich voice, in the expressiveness and refinement of every speaking gesture as she begged me to go.

Her clothing, too, though I could see but little of it, so hidden was it by the enveloping motor coat that she wore, was anything but what one would expect to be worn by the women of a beachcombers' settlement.

As she ran toward me the movement of her limbs flung aside the bottom of the coat and showed beneath it the lace edge of a dainty dress of white and a peep of stocking whose sheen was undoubtedly that of an excellent quality of silk.

Completely puzzled by the incongruity of her situation I must have appeared stupid to her as I sat there silent and unmoving in the face of her feverish attempts to make me realize my danger.

Instead of answering I merely looked first at her and then up at the hovels silhouetted on the rock against the sky and then down at her again. Finally her repetition of the words "kill you" brought me to my senses and I vaulted out of the fuselage to the sand.

"Why am I in danger?" I demanded. "Why should they kill me, and who are they?"

Again she looked in terror toward the huts, her wonderful eyes wide with fright as she turned them back to me.

"Oh, I cannot explain," she cried. "There is not time and I do not know. I only know that they will kill any one who comes here. You must go at once. They are asleep after last night, but the noise of your motor will waken them. Then it will be too late if you have not started."

"It seems to me," I said, "that you are living among rather a melodramatic set of pirates for a girl of your evident education and refinement. If these men are so desperate, aren't you in danger, too?"

"No, not yet," she answered hastily. "That is—I do not know—I cannot explain. But you will only make my position worse by staying. You must hurry. I will help you start."

Again her fathomable eyes turned upon me appealingly, moist now, I thought, with tears that were very near the surface. I ground my teeth together in rage. The thought of any one harming or even distressing such a woman made me clinch my fists with an impotent longing to protect her at any cost.

"Look here," I said, "I don't know anything about you, though you seem to know who I am. But I do know this—if you are in danger here, I want to get you out of it, and I can do it. My Bleriot is a passenger machine.

"If you jump in, I will have you among friends in less than half an hour, and after that I shall be glad to place myself entirely at your disposal for whatever action you want to take against these people here. Will you do it?"

A flash of eager desire to accept blazed in her eyes, but it died almost immediately.

"Oh, if I only could," she murmured in a hopeless voice. "But, don't you see, that would make it even worse for father." She must have realized that I did not comprehend, for she smiled wanly.

"But you do not understand. Father is a prisoner in one of the houses. They have beaten him cruelly several times when he has refused to obey them, and they have told me repeatedly that they will kill him if I attempt to get help from outside. So that is the reason why you must hurry away.

"If they see me talking to you here they will think that you are planning to aid us, and then—oh, you do not know what beasts they are! Really—really, you must go at once. I shall find a way; but you must not try to help me, for that will only make matters worse for both of us."

"But who are these people?" I demanded.

"I do not know. I do not know anything, except that father is in danger, and that his danger increases with every moment that you stay. Please go!"

"I'll go on one condition," I said stepping up very close to her, moved almost beyond control by the womanly fragrance that came from her. "One condition—that you will send me word if I can help you at any time. Will you promise?"

"You are very good, but— Yes, I promise. Now, please hurry!"

I dragged the Bleriot farther along the streets of level sand and wheeled it around. It was the work of a moment only to replace the wire, and then I mounted to my seat.

As I did so I noticed what appeared to be tracks of wheels in the sand; but there was no time for further examination, for two turns of the rear starter had been answered by a resounding roar from my motor, and I was off.

But as I rose the memory of those tracks brought a sudden suspicion to my mind. They were not the marks of wagon-wheels; they were vaguely familiar because of their oddity, and I swung back to wave farewell to the girl and to glance at the sand.

The sun slanted upon the level stretch in such a way that almost every pebble and shell was plainly visible. My suspicions were fully confirmed.

Running along the entire length of the level space were the wheel-marks, always in two pairs, with the impressions of a central skid showing every here and there between them.

Only one type of machine in the world could leave such tracks. That was a Farman biplane.

And the only Farman biplane within a thousand miles belonged to Miguel Casserta, the Night Flyer!

CHAPTER III.
Mystery.

"Tad," I said as we trundled the machine back to the hangar, "tell me what you know about this man, Casserta."

"Who—Mike the Mex? Not very much," Tad answered. "He's a queer cuss, and Sanojas, his mechanician, is queerer. Neither one of 'em ever mixes much around here. Sanojas pretends he can't get the hang of the English, and so he never talks; but I've seen him listenin' to other people's conversation in a way that showed me he wasn't missin' much. What do you want to know about 'em?"

"Nothing in particular. I was merely curious about Casserta's flights."

Tad shook his head.

"I can't tell you much about 'em," he said. "He never goes up in the daytime, and I'm never here at night; but I can stay tonight without them knowin' it, and I'll guarantee they won't do much that I don't see, if that's what you want,"

After we had put the Bleriot away, and Tad had begun polishing it with the loving care that a faithful groom gives to a blue-ribbon horse, I sat on a bench outside and mentally reviewed the surprising outcome of my jaunt through the air. Try as I would, I could not forget the pathetic appeal in the wonderful eyes of the girl on the point. What was the mystery that surrounded her?

Who were the ruffians of whom she was in such mortal terror, yet from whom she could not flee? And what had Casserta to do with them?

The tracks of his Farman on the strip of sand were no mere accident such as my landing had been. I had plainly seen dozens or scores of his wheel-marks, crossing and re-crossing, proof sufficient that his visits to the point were frequent and that the strip of sand was his regular landing place.

The puzzle became deeper with my every attempt to solve it; but, as my mystification grew, there grew also an overpowering longing to help this girl in her troubles and a determination to probe as deeply into the enigma as I could without endangering her.

With the Bleriot polished and resplendent, Tad joined me outside the hangar and returned with me to the hotel in my runabout.

At dinner I decided to act that very night. It was impossible to plan an elaborate campaign; all I could do was to go out to the flying field after dark and learn as much as I could about the man who had become such an important factor in my life.

Rather than risk the noise of my runabout I borrowed Tad's bicycle, and by eight o'clock I had safely hidden it behind the hangar, and was seated patiently on the ground, listening intently for some sound that would be the signal for me to start my investigations. But for an hour nothing happened to break the stillness of the field.

Very carefully I rose to reconnoiter.

In the rear of one of the sheds I found a long ladder, and this I quietly carried to Casserta's hangar and set it up without a sound. Its top rung came just below one of the two little windows high in the air. Feeling my way every inch, I climbed until my eyes were above the sill.

Inside the shed an oil-lantern, hanging on a hook on the side wall, burned dimly and threw ghostly, distorted shadows of the big Farman against the opposite side. There was not a movement nor a sound within.

As my eyes became accustomed to the semidarkness, I saw the form of Sanojas, the mechanician, stretched out on an army cot under the lantern. He was asleep.

Regaining the ground, and thankful for such a place of vantage from which to watch, I once more took up my vigil, wondering if, through the perversity of fate, I had chosen a night when Casserta did not intend to fly.

Suddenly the stillness was broken by the loud clangor of an alarm-clock from the shed behind me. It was the work of a moment only to mount to the window, and I saw Sanojas rise from the cot, stretch sleepily, turn up the wick of the lantern, and then push open the big sliding doors.

He was evidently preparing for his chief's arrival. My vigil had not been in vain.

Fifteen minutes later I heard the soft purring of an automobile some distance away. The sound drew nearer and nearer, and the machine finally swung off the main road, ran up to the flying-field entrance, and stopped there.

From my perch on top of the ladder I saw Sanojas standing in front of the open doors, peer through the darkness to where the lights of the machine showed dimly at the gates. Then, with a word of greeting to some one who approached, he entered the hangar, followed by Casserta and a woman whose form and movements seemed vaguely familiar to me, but whose face I could not see until she stepped within the circle of light from the lantern.

"Inez Ogden!" I muttered to myself. "In the name of all that is mysterious, what is she doing mixed up in this?"

She was a writer who was a familiar figure around the field. Her connection with one of the leading weekly magazines gave her the entire entree to our little colony of aviators, and her really excellent accounts of our machines and our flights had won her the respect of every man in the business.

She was a beautiful woman, of that flashing but unemotional type that compels admiration while repelling all thought of sentiment. She mixed with us freely, talking aviation with the certainty of an expert, allowing perfect freedom of speech from all, but conducting herself with a cold reserve that froze any warmer feeling than that of sexless companionship.

As I watched her now from my high position at the window I marked the calm assurance with which she flung aside her light dust-coat and donned her heavier garments which Sanojas took from a locker and handed to her. She seemed to pay not the slightest attention to Casserta as he removed his outer clothing and put on his flying suit within five feet of her.

One did not hesitate to do such things with Inez Ogden.

All this time there had not been a word spoken by any of the trio. All seemed to understand perfectly just what was to be done, and they wasted no time. Sanojas busied himself about the machine, testing every wire and satisfying himself that all was in perfect condition. Finally he broke the silence.

He was standing undecidedly over a box that contained a complicated-looking mechanical apparatus. It was that box, we had always understood, that carried the invention upon which Casserta was working for the solution of the problem of automatic control.

"Will you try the experiment tonight?" asked Sanojas.

Casserta and Miss Ogden both glanced at him, and then at each other and laughed.

"No," said Casserta. "It will not be necessary tonight. There is no one around. Then, too, we have already brought back all that we shall need for some time. Senorita Ogden has done the good work this week, and, besides, they are well supplied over there."

So the night had brought me two discoveries.

First, the mysterious invention upon which Casserta was working was a blind, pure and simple, to explain his flights should explanation and proof ever be necessary. Second, Inez Ogden was working with him and with the rascals in the huts in the business which was bringing such suffering to my little girl with the hazel eyes.

Sanojas wheeled the big machine out upon the field, and was followed almost at once by the other two.

I could not see them out there in the darkness, but soon the loud, sputtering of the motor announced their preparations to start. Casserta opened and shut the switch several times; and then, as the sound of the motor settled to its accustomed vibrant purr, I knew that Sanojas had released the machine and that it had sped down the field for its start into the air.

WOMAN'S DANGER PERIOD

The period between forty-five and fifty-five years of age is said to be a crisis or danger period in a woman's life which tests her for her fitness to continue in the race. It is then that she suffers from such annoying symptoms as heat-flashes, nervousness, headaches, "the blues," or dread of impending evil, or some dormant disease in the system becomes active. When a woman is passing through this crisis there is one tried and true remedy, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which after forty years of success is now considered the standard remedy for woman's ailments.

FAMOUS TRACK STARS WILL MEET AT CHICAGO SPEEDWAY ON SUNDAY

RALPH MULFORD
One of the greatest auto racers in the world, who has entered in the big event Sunday afternoon. Each driver must put up $2,000 as a part of the $25,000 purse offered and each car entered must have a speed of 105 miles an hour.

LOUIS CHEVROLET
Winner of the Chicago Derby and Speedway champion of 1917, who will defend his honors against Ralph De Palma, Dario Resta, Ralph Mulford and Arthur Duray in the Internaiional Auto Sweepstakes at the Chicago Speedway Sunday.

SIXTH MAN ENTERED FOR INTERNATIONAL RACE NEXT SUNDAY

Ira Vail Makes Necessary Mark With Hudson And Gets In Big Event

$27,000.00 IS OFFERED

Prizes Total Big Sum—Each Driver Puts Up $2,000 Of Own Money

With the addition of Ira Vail, the young Brooklyn speed demon, who is making his last appearance before joining the American aviation service, the field in the International Swepestakes at the Chicago Speedway Sunday afternoon now numbers six of the greatest drivers. The speed pilots and the nations which they will represent follow:

Ira Vail, United States.
Ralph Mulford, United States.
Louis Chevrolet, France.
Ralph De Palma, Italy.
Arthur Duray, Belgium.
Dario Resta, Great Britain.

Vail fulfilled every qualification for the race by driving his Hudson super-six car two miles at a speed of 112 miles an hour, by posting his entry fee of $2,000, and by getting the consent of the other drivers. This latter was difficult because the race is practically an invitation match contest where each driver is putting up $2,000 of his own money with the management adding $15,000.

The youngster who has been the sensation of the speedways for the last two seasons, got in because it will be his last chance to compete in a race before he dons the khaki of Uncle Sam. Immediately after the race he will go to the Wilbur Wright aviation field at Dayton, O., where he will become one of Uncle Sam's flyers. As he has already had considerable experience as an aviator he expects to be sent to Europe soon.

The $2,000 entry fee of Vail will be added to the first prize, making it $17,000. The second prize will be $5,000, the third $3,000, the fourth $1,500 and the fifth $500. There will be no sixth prize.

All of the drivers are now on the Speedway tuning up their cars for the contest which is expected to shatter many records and also determine just who is th greatest driver under all conditions.

For this purpose the race will be run in five heats at two, ten, twenty, thirty and fifty miles. The winner in each heat will score six points; second five points; third, four points; fourth, three points; fifth two points and sixth one point. The driver scoring the greatest number of points in the five heats will be the winner.

Thomas J. Hay will be the starter and John De Long will be assistant starter, while E. C. Patterson will be referee and the chairman of the technical committee will be E. P. Edwards.

The advance sale of seats is breaking all records, especially the orders from out of town. The races will be gin at 3 o'clock sharp in the afternoon and will be over before 6 o'clock so that everyone will have a chance to get home at a reasonable hour.

Had Good Imagination.

Edward had a new little playmate who possessed much more imagination than he. To John a chair was a chair only occasionally. It in turn became a steed, or, armed with two yardsticks for oars, it proved to be a boat. Blocks turned quickly into various kinds of animals, etc. When Edward returned home after his first visit his mother asked him how he liked his new little neighbor, and Edward replied: "Oh, he is fine. He has such a good pretendery."

HENRY'S HARD-EARNED CHECK NEAR WASH TUB

RED CROSS CAME NEAR LOSING SECOND DONATION FROM HENRY LEBOWICH.

Henry Lebowich, after assisting Louis Bryan with his threshing for three days this week, returned last evening and today sunburnt and sore, physically, is attending to his duties as shoe merchant.

"Well, Henry, how did you fare this time?" asked the newspaper man.

"I tell you I had a good time, but I worked hard; say, I earned $5 in good money. I have the check for the amount, I sure have, but I left the check in my pants pocket at home, and 'Ma' she went to wash the pants, and nearly put them in the washtub with check and all. It was mighty lucky that I discovered what she was doing before she destroyed that check," said the shoe merchant.

"I telephoned her; yes, I telephoned 'Ma' to look out for the check after I found out tat se was going to wash them pants."

"What are you going to do with the $5?" asked the scribe.

"I am going to turn that check over to Warren Durkes and instruct him to turn the money over to the Red Cross," said Henry.

"Say, Henry, what do you yet for working on the farm, and how can you afford to give the farmers so much of your valuable time?"

"Well, I'm telling you, I get potatoes, I will receive several bushels of potatoes and that will keep 'Ma' and I in potatoes this winter."

"Say, I was sore, very sore the day I commenced threshing. A Dixon man said to me, 'Henry, did you come out here on the farm to eat a good meal?'

"No, I did not. You just stick around here for a few minutes and I will show you what I am here for.

"Ge, but I was mad, was mad. I want to work, andw I do ork, and I will work on a farm just as long as they need the business men," declared Henry, who by this time was very warm under the collar.

Seriously, Henry Lebowich is doing his part in this war work and reports come in that he is doing his share on the farm and makes a very good farm hand.

CUSTOM FOR CUSTOM'S SAKE

English Church Authorities Continue to Distribute Coins, Though Reason for Doing So Is Forgotten.

In accordance with ancient custom, six-penny pieces were distributed on Good Friday in the churchyard of St. Bartholomew-the-Great, West Smithfield, to 21 widows resident in the parish of St. Bartholomew. The coins were dropped upon one of the flat tombstones by Corporal W. H. Irons, R. E. (under church warden), and the widows, whose ages ranged from eighty-five to sixty, were required to pick them up. Concerning the origin of the custom, nothing is definitely known. Until Mr. Butterworth, some thirty years ago, invested a sum of money sufficient to assure what was needed to continue the custom on Good Fridays, the distribution was in danger of being discontinued, inasmuch as there was no fund from which the money was supplied. Until then the expense was borne by the church wardens. The nave of the church once stood upon the spot where the money is now distributed, but was destroyed at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries. Mr. Deputy Turner, who died last year, had conducted the ceremony for 30 years.—London Morning Post.

New Chapter in Anthropology.

It is an extraordinary chapter in anthropology that Prof. Wood-Jones, of the University of London, reads in the Talgai skull and associated remains discovered in New South Wales in 1889. The antiquity suggested is far greater than that of the European ancient skulls, and, instead of being descendants of the anthropoid apes, the human race is shown to have been so highly developed as to have boats and domesticated dogs before the apes appeared. This skull, distinctly human and highly mineralized, was in a stratum with extinct pouched animals. Bones of dingo dogs were found in a similar stratum, and with them bones of extinct pouched animals that had been gnawed by the dogs. Only pouched animals were known in Australia at the time of Captain Cook. Australia has been an island since pouched animals were evolved, and it is argued that the Talgai man must have come in a boat with his family and dogs.

Make Bread From Moss.

The Indians along the Columbia river make a kind of bread from a moss that grows on the spruce fir-tree. This moss is prepared by placing in heaps, sprinkling it with water, and permitting it to ferment. Then it is rolled into balls as big as a man's head, and these are baked in pits.
